THE SUMMER'S DAY;

WITH NIGHT AND DEATH:
POEMS.

BY A GENTLEMAN OF COVENT-GARDEN THEATRE.

Now open Helicon, and Songs inspire
Celestial Muses. ————— VIRG.

Thine be the theme, O blest Urania, thine,
With those thy sisters on Pierus born,
First by Eupheme foster'd, nymph divine;
Now by the God of Harmony and Light,
Ineffable! o'er th' sacred whole presiding.
O lead me where the inspir'd waters glide,
Smooth as the silver verse they patronise;
Winding their choirs thro' sweet Bœotia's vast,
Trembling on th' surface of the crystal fount,
Where thy own Publius Virgilius drank,
Immortaliz'd by Heaven, and next by Thee.

SUMMER'S DAY.

MORNING.

MINERVA's wakeful bird, stout Chanticleer,
Heralds the dawn, with clarion lofty notes,
And, as th' alarum, wakes the neighb'ring swains,
And calls the frolic ploughman to the field,

Look o'er yon hill, how fair the infant face
Of rosy morning breaks; now mists arise,
Vapours of parent Earth; thick clouds disperse;
And, as from darkest Chaos, the fair day,
Resumes its form of beauteous majesty!
The warbling lark, in sweetest melody,
Strains its little throat, rising to meet th' morn.

Lo! i' the east, where mild Aurora, rolls,
In car of burnish'd gold, beset with gems,
Such as the eastern province teem withal:
The di'mond, glitt'ring like my fair one's eyes;

The ruby, that resembles her moist lip;
 The orient pearl, enamel'd as the tear,
 Which oft I've seen steal down her pallid cheek,
 For mis'ry real—or fictitious woe!
 Welcome, thrice welcome, Sol's behest, daughter,
 And harbinger of Hyperion beauties!

Now golden Horus, tops yon tufted trees:—
 Hail! God of light,—thou ever glorious sun,
 Whose beams, impower'd by the crooked sign,
 Ripen the fruits, and gladden all our plains,
 Whose diadem, imperial sends forth rays,—
 Rays, that illumine the earth, and e'en the air
 Make visible, as the dust that flies before it:—
 Lo! how prettily the myriads sparkle!

Now th' atmosphere, with streaks of sapphire blue
 Is varied, and th' embroider'd east, retains
 Th' fiery colours of the blazing carbuncle.

Behold! oh Industry—yon tawny group,
 Wide scatt'ring fragrance, o'er the stubble land,
 Each toiling hard as th' industrious bee:
 Some with broad sweep, mowing the bended grass,
 While some the hay embrown'd for carting, heap;
 Now they gather;—the welcome drink goes round,
 In playful mood, they crack the hearty joke,
 Joyous, loud rings the field with vacant laughs:
 While th' mischief-loving throng, at distance keep,

Smothering each other, with th' fragrant armfull,
 Well pleas'd to think, the toil must be renew'd!
 The keen-ey'd farmer, on his rustic steed,
 Scours, with careful watch, the tarnish'd fields.

How sweet the early huntsman winds his horn;
 And oh! how sweetly too it is refin'd,
 By distant echo, in the wanton gale;
 While th' high-mettled horses, prick up their ears
 Expectant, and th' uncoupl'd deep-mouth'd hounds,
 Stretching their limbs, yelp eager for the chase.

The game and rosy health be their pursuit!
 While th' crabbed lowly citizen, in view
 Has other sport; nor stops his swift career,
 Till his cramm'd coffers, burst, with ill-got store,
 Industrious earnings, I'd applaud to heav'n,
 Heav'n approving, the same, wou'd reapplaud;
 But riches, gather'd by nefarious means,
 Are, in the end, cankers to human joy.
 Many, alas! with fortunes not their own,
 Roll in affluence, and ostentatious waste;
 Their days one scene of luxury and riot!
 While the just owners, pine in want, and woe;
 Each new day, some mis'ry new appearing;
 Till sorrow teeming, sorrows fruitful child,
 Magnetic, draws them to a timeless grave!
 The first companion of my tender years,

Found this an awful and a grievous truth.

From the common herd of men, Horatio
Selected was; a tried and valued friend:
His heart was open, and his love, sincere;
Sweet Charity was enamour'd of him;
He stuck close by her; in him, the needy
Ever found relief:—oh! 'twas his chief care
To search the wretched out, and comfort them
With largess means, and soothing tenderness.

He dyed—lamented much, by all good men,
And left his infant son (my schoolfellow)
Heir to an estate—not inconsiderable:
It had been more, had he been less benevolent.

Hear; hear!—thou awful God of justice, hear!—
Are those distinct, and moulded from thy hand,
With whom th' bonds of blood and nature, are Silken ligatures, easy as cobwebs broke?—
—Shut th' book of holy writ—for shou'd we pause,
Th' immense deficiency, strike the mad'ning thought,
A drear abyss, where soul and body lies!
All nature's movements, wheel against herself,
And man is now, as the first angel, fall'n:
Th' strongest friendship—with rotten packthread tied!
Brother 'gainst brother wars, for int'rest vile,
And e'en the one-twinn'd with him at a birth,
To filch of well-shared wealth he nightly plods

While Avarice grim, close at his elbows wait.
 Oh judgment hard indeed, and yet too true,
 A melancholy instance lies before us.

Horatio with his dying breath, bequeath'd
 Unto his brother, whom he lov'd full well,
 The care of seeing his dear infant, rear'd,
 In virtue's paths—to know his God! and taste
 The cheering comforts of religion pure.
 His promise, to the nicest particle,
 Was well perform'd, while many rolling years
 Went o'er:—the day at length arrived, joyous,
 That ripens into man, the goodly youth:
 In gentlest terms, he for his birthright, spake—
 Hear, and revenge ye powers!—'twas deny'd!
 The wretch had long revolv'd the means to keep it
 Safe in his own grasp:—one way presented,
 And that, a way, which seem'd to cloak the deed;
 His eldest daughter now, had reach'd those years,
 When the soft virgin, blushing thro' her charms,
 Yields to th' embrace of some dear tender youth,
 With hand to hand, mutual, heart to heart.

He tender'd her—she was refus'd, with marks
 Of horror, and of indignation high!
 He then was told such marriages were frequent!—
 Too much so, Sir,—replied the steady youth,

Were they less, men would be less, incestuous!
 Oh! give me love in all its delicacies!—
 Th' fairest am'ranth, that springs from rosy earth;
 Soft, pure, and gentle, as the flowing tide;
 Free, mild, and open, as th' ambient air;
 Clear, bright, and shining, as the topaz flames;
 And such is frankincense for gods, and men!
 You now Sir know my mind, which by my soul
 I swear, shall never veer, but as the sun,
 Keep one due, common course; harder to check
 Than fierce tempestuous seas—unless as them,
 My mind is sway'd by Luna's influence!
 Your will, unjust, may haply be obey'd
 When reason flies me, and I'm not myself:
 Your frowns enforcement, then, will care me nothing.
 They parted, each dissatisfied—but oh!
 Hard to tell—next morn, my Henry, was seiz'd—
 My friend was seiz'd by rude unhallow'd hands;
 Thrown in a prison vile, for a vast sum,
 'Twas said his education cost!—ah! me!
 He pin'd poor soul, for three sad tedious years,
 Then sorrowing died—quite broken hearted!
 Now this wretch—this uncle—as next of kin
 Possesses it, and rolls in seeming ease!—
 Curses, deep, fall thick, and heavy on him!

Oh! in his winter days, may ev'ry coin,
Become a sting, an insect, venomous,
To gnaw this blight of sweet humanity!

Oh! Nature! nature, of thy injustice,
I am near complaint—oh! why shou'd the rich
Spurn at the greatest attribute of Heav'n?
And treat the gift, the noble God-like gift,
Dear Charity, as an unworthy thing?
Broad in wealth—but narrow in truest worth!
'Tis pity—but th' gen'rous are ever poor—
Save when the heart, ponders the goodly deed,
Then ev'ry thought, is worth a million acres!
Far richer each, than is a monarch's crown.

Oh! I cou'd waste, years, on the grateful theme,
'Till second childhood, pluckt me from my thought.

Nor mindless of thy pleasing studies; broad
And infinite, Philosophy divine:
Back'd by the deep'ning wonders of Astrology!
To sit and watch the motion of the heav'ns;
T' observe the spheres, in their successive round;
To search the sun's returning cycle out:
Then sing the beauties of revolving years.

The purple morn of Spring, sweetly bedeck'd
With fresh primroses—(oh! heart-cheering cry,
For it foretels the gladsome season near)
When smiling Phæbus, ent'ring Taurus bold,

Without distinction gives the lowly shrub,
 A leafage, green, as the most tow'ring branch;
 Their sleeky backs new plum'd, the birds come forth,
 Vent'ring from out their gloomy, warm abodes,
 And with misdoubtful hop, from bush to bush,
 Trembling, they seem their natures to forget,
 'Till bolder growing, by repeated proffs,
 Cheer'd by the sun, with full expanded wing,
 Warbling they dash the empyrean sky.

Now, Horus, mounted in his blazing car,
 Gemini quitting a while in Cancer, burns,
 Spreading wide, with boundless pow'r unnerving;
 The noontide beams of Summer's parching heat;
 And Nature, drest in gayest mantle, walks
 Abroad, to view the gardens she has made;
 Nor do the flowers only wear a smiling face,
 The frisky herd, participates the scene,
 And equal with the school-boy's wanton lave,
 Breaking oft, with many a playful dash,
 The glassy surface of the limpid stream.

Now one loud clap, which seems to rend the air,
 Grumbles the distant vaults of æther through!
 While the poor prattler climbs the parent's knee,
 (Protection fill'd with Nature's self) and asks,
 "If God is angry with the naughty world?"

Wide bursts th' roaring torrent, down, and rapid

Impetuous as th' whirlwind, sweeps afar!—

Pow'rful element! unequal opposition!

Now from the angel sign, reluctant Sol,

(As a sad lover parting from his love)

With Libra weighs, the equal day and night

Throughout wide Terra's deep, revolving round,

The Line, so called, by Ocean's gen'rous sons,

Or Equinox autumnal. Now the corn

Ripe o'er the field, as a vast army waves;

And nut-brown Ceres, to her cot returns,

Deep laden with the swelling year, and prest

With the rich fruits, of our old parent, Earth.

Now hoary Winter, spreads the fallen gloom—

When Horus over Capricornus rules,

And redd'ning, angry, at his pow'r confin'd,

Wide rolls his blazing car, thro' æther's gates.

The winds blow keen, the lazy snows descend;

And adamant bound, the captive waves,

That lately roll'd, so saucily along,

Crest-fall'n, their azure wings, no longer skim,

And flit defiance at the angler's float;

While stiff'd myriads search the friendly break,

And greedy, drink the lif'ning portion down:

E'en then thy beams, O Sun! but faintly shed,

(The summit of thy regal pow'r resign'd

In favour of thy sister goddess, dear)

Still cheers us, as we trip the glitt'ring ground.

Oh God! thy boundless, wonder-working hand,
Thy mercy infinite, and grace benign,
Are visible in all things ;—wherefore else,
The best on earth, so early snatch'd to heav'n?
Snatch'd from temptation's lure—which lulls and charms
The sleeping senses, into thoughtless deeds,
Wou'd the dear welfare hazard of our souls!
Or why the bad, unheeded left behind,
If not for heaven-born repentance sake?
So in the end to be (if possible)
Somewhat worthy of thy sweet salvation.

Oh heav'n, how greatly wond'rous are thy gifts,
Shou'd we ponder—what vast immensity!
E'en from the fashion of this thankless globe:
There Chaos stood—a rude stupendous mass,
Confus'd and void—not bearing form so much,
As may be figur'd in a summer cloud!
From this side sprang, by the all-wise command,
Fields, flowers, flocks, and tempting golden fruits,
Beauteous as those where our first parents fell;
Steeds, oxen, herbs, and all the feather'd heaps
That wing the bosom of the liquid air!
Forth from the other, ocean, vast and boundless;
The finny legions; grim and rugged rocks;
And all that in this element inhabit:—

Then to complete the wond'rous design,
 Forth from the centre, rush'd, the wonder, Man!
 In reason, noble, and in form, majestic!
 The striking image, e'en of God himself!
 Thus was fair Creation form'd, sublime from nought,
 Save the vast bounties of the Great Supreme!
 Giver of all! the King of heav'n and earth;
 And thus, on flow'rs treading, the rosy trip
 Of nimble-footed morn, from midnight springs.

NOON.

WHERE shall I hide from the meridian heat?
Had giddy Phaeton now the solar reins,
Perchance, the world wou'd shortly be on blaze!
—Shall I as th' shepherd, seek some cool retreat,
Shaded by poplars, where th' gentle streamlet
Glides on, in wanton flow?—or the thick grove,
Where th' wide spreading branches, of the tall pines,
So close embrace, day-light can scarce peep through?
How lazily yon tawny ditcher, digs,
Bare limb'd, three feet within the mine of earth,
The soft encroachment of Nature, spurning
In conscious, hard, necessitated use!—
The shepherds' curs are basking in the sun;
No balmy breeze breaks in upon the heat,
The winds condens'd, in bags are close tied up;
The fainting herd, seek the refreshing shade,
And panting steeds whose blood as madness boil,
Laves in the shallow brook;—the unnerv'd reaper,
The sickle drops, from out his wither'd hand,
Meas'ring his swarthy length, along the ground,
As struck by æthers, blue, electric fire!

How sweetly calm, the face of Nature shows?
 No noise is heard—save the swallows twitt'ring;
 The drowsy hum of the resistless bee;—
 And chirping of the merry grasshopper,
 Beating briskly his green enamel'd sides,
 In playful mood, against a wither'd branch,
 Which rings aloud, incredible indeed!
 The sapless hollow, having died away,
 And this, to call th' females all together.
 —Oh! what a heav'n-refreshing gale was there,
 Its sweetness was stol'n from yon roseate bow'r!
 How it enriches and perfumes the air!
 Now the poor oxen, and th' frolic ploughman,
 Enjoy a sweet, tho' short surcease from toil.
 Brown bread, cold meat, and thrilling home-brew'd ale,
 The sauce content, make him a hearty meal;
 No sad'ning thought, supine, breaks in, of where
 The costly viand, decks the gaudy board;
 For there, oft'times, the lordly owner's pall'd.
 Sitting on a bench, playing with his dog,
 He eats and talks;—he drinks and laughs aloud;
 Shuts up his knife, and teaches Crab new tricks;
 Plays a short time in awkward clumsiness,
 With the hale, sturdy, red-arm'd dairy maid;
 And bawling the end of an old ballad,
 Wherein some ghost is seen, with saucer eyes!

Some scullion rais'd to wealth!—or murder foul,
 Found out by rattling stones!—scratch'd up by hounds,
 Or loudly spoken by some thund'ring sprite!
 These oft repeated, then to work inclin'd
 Takes him to the half-furrow'd field again.

On yonder bank shaded with firs, behold
 Where blithsome Colin sits, his pipe laid by,
 Pouring th' effusions of his honest heart,
 With fervent zeal, in lov'd Amanda's ear;
 The dimpl'd smile, graces her blushing cheek,
 Playful as loves upon the rose's bed!

As the ivy, and honeysuckle sweet,
 From one kind kindred stalk doth seem to grow:
 So they in Love's sweet magic, seem entwined;
 See how she glances!—languishing delight!—
 Yet innocent as Hebe!—harmless maid,
 Such looks doth silver Cynthia, deign mankind,

Happy! thrice happy swain, that loves full well,
 And is full well belov'd:—what boundless bliss!
 What hybla sweets, wou'd my Eliza list,
 Enraptur'd thus, to her Lorenzo's song!
 But ah! th' mistaken maid, as Daphne flies,
 And as Apollo can I not pursue!
 Oh! Love—'tis sure against thy nature, rosy,
 T' be thus worried into bare compliance.

One morn I met her, in the cypress grove,
 Where love's soft tale's scarce ever told in vain;
 And where the timid maid, with flutt'ring heart,
 First hears the ardent youth, declare his vows,
 'Till truth serene, appears in ev'ry strain,
 Reciprocal in wish, they joy to meet,
 And all the live-long day discourse of love!
 Where the gem illustrious—a guileless heart,
 Asbestos like, grows purer by the flame;
 Where stealing pity, roots, and ripens quick,
 To fondest wishes, for some sadd'ning youth;
 Where shepherds hie, to chant their tender lays,
 And meet the gladsome eyes of their lov'd mates,
 Which glancing, speak, ten thousand wordless things:
 —No tread of guilty ghost, from the cold tomb
 Emerg'd, to pour his plaints in waning night,
 Or speak of treasures, hoarded in the lap
 Of Earth—ill got, ere life pulse ceas'd to beat,
 For which, he waits, the awful, final day!
 When crimes expansive, all denude appear!
 No such sad spirit can infest the haunt,
 So still! so hallow'd! is the sacred shade!
 There catching inspiration, for the spot
 Was consecrated by the goddess bright
 Who rose from Ocean's bed—fair Venus call'd!

I op'd in accents soft my bleeding heart,
And dealt with all the eloquence of love:
For love wou'd make the dumb e'en rich in words,
Such force, as studied speech can ne'er attain.

Awhile she listen'd to my artless tale!
I thought me blest!—she smil'd!—I was in heav'n!
But oh! when that I hop'd to seal my heart,
With fervent kisses on her ruby lips;
She, as a gliding phantom mock'd my hold!
And swifter than Ceneus' daughter, left me,
A wretch, invited to a rich repast,
But when approach'd—'twas marble! cruel maid.
Affection bade me follow—reason, stay—
And strong to mem'ry brought the solemn compact;
If inclination sweet, lead not the hand,
That free as air, presents the gentle heart,
What joy permanent, what lasting bliss,
Can the cramped soul, of such a reptile taste?
A dæmon, he—an angel sacrifice!
Oh! rather let me shun the holy rite;
And as the shallow, self-admiring boy,
Gazing i' the stream (downward alas! from heav'n)
Catch at the shadow of a trivial shade.

How beauteous does th' chequer'd landscape show,
Lo! here the brook, winding his wanton course,
And gently murm'ring, pace with the azure clouds;

There, the rude dashing of the foaming waters,
 Falling impetuous 'tween the rugged cliffs,
 That hang stupendous, o'er the valley deep!
 Westward the yellow fields—how the full face
 Of golden Ceres, shines!—while the farmer
 Climbs him some hill, to view his acres large,
 Counting the produce of the swelling year,
 His heart high bounds with transport at the gain.

Proceed, ye sons of labour and of wealth;
 Your's be the task, to scatter plenty round,
 With lavish hand; anticipate the wants,
 And give the poor a blessing ere they ask.

Stretching towards the blazing East, behold
 The frightened shepherd, with his crook and cur,
 Bursts from the shade, as fearful of the wolf,
 Who hungry, prowls ere noontide beams are past.
 While the playful lambkins, unsuspicious,
 Do skip and bound in harmless merriment.
 Oh! God! how blest! how infinitely blest!
 Cou'd I from this rude present nature leap,
 And change with one, of yonder fleecy kind!
 To frolic, cheerly range the flow'ry fields,
 Drink of the fountain clear, and feed upon
 Meanders green, moisten'd with morning dew:
 No loves perplex their breasts, see how they roll
 And play in friendship on the close-nipp'd turf!

Or if not so, oh! wou'd I had thine harp,
 Thine, or thy fire's, thou love-persuading youth,
 Son of the Delphic God! whose matron shines
 Most prominent of all the inspir'd nine,
 Goddess of Rhet'ric, thrice divine Caliope!

How wretched th' ling'ring minutes pass, to him
 Who fondly doats—yet is not doated on;
 Who loves, who mourns, who pines in dark'ning doubt,
 Whose tender plaints, fill ev'ry dell and grove.

To you ye Naiades, I attune my lay;
 To you ye Feronia, I address my song;
 To you ye Parcæ, sisters three—winged
 With the dreary care of mortals, wretched,
 Whose magic tells the future and the past;—
 Or thou great Cybele, say, shall the nymph
 That has such honey-power o'er my soul,
 E'er return sweet for sweet?—I conjure thee,
 By Cælum, the most ancient of the gods;
 By Saturn, and the pine, all, sacred all!
 Tell me and ease my poor distracted soul:
 For oh! when her bright beauties, shine not here,
 Methinks the lamp of being is extinct!
 Life is no life at all!—a gloomy void!
 Goodness is lost, unless 'tis good from her;
 Nor aught without her, has its wonted taste,
 Save the sour draught, of Sorrow's care-worn chalice;

With true love's tears replenish'd—unsweeten'd
 With the faint and misty glimm'ring of hope,
 Which oft, tho' distant, breaks on the woe-worn wretch.
 Careless of love and me the cruel maid—
 Smiles in derision of my hapless woe,
 Or frowns, as fate, when I wou'd ope my heart,
 And show the purple drops that gush from thence.

Lo! where yon gentle reader sits, recluse
 From the gay world, beneath the nut-brown, bow'r,
 Where sun beams parching, cannot penetrate,
 Indulging silent meditation!

Many and oft the times, that I have stol'n
 From riotous, dissipated revelry,
 Where borrow'd flashes of repeated wit,
 (Folly's sense) have set the board in uproar,
 'Till mirthful tears, like rain, ran down the cheeks
 Of those, that ne'er shed one, for others' woes:
 From such rude vacant laughs, thief like I've stol'n,
 And tript me lightly to the cooling shade,
 Enjoying there, a lonely contemplation!
 Oh! to a mind, like mine, impress'd with love,
 'Tis a soothing, rich, and luscious banquet.

What sweets melleous, the soft rising breeze,
 Wafts from yon field of scatter'd, new-mown hay,
 Made still more od'rous by its passage thro'
 Yon cover'd hedge of pretty eglantine.

The more I stray, the more I stand amaz'd,
 At Nature's full, and wonder-working scene!
 Look where the hill, tow'ring, doth seem to check
 The threat'ning brows of cumbrous leaden clouds;
 Here the thick woods, askaunce the opening lawn,
 There the rich mead, the dale, the tufted grove,
 Th' mantling ivy, creeping on the remains
 Of yonder gothic pile, which seems to boast,
 As an old warrior, what he former was,
 And still proud of his remaining grandeur,
 Majestic, keeps his rugged hoary head,
 Full horizontal, with the lusty oaks:
 These and the silver stream, amid the trees
 Oft hiding, playful, brings to our memory,
 The well-strung fables, of Arcadian haunts;
 Of sweet Bæotia's plains; or Ida's mount,
 Where Priam's am'rous son, first gave to Love,
 The golden present, in despite of heav'n:
 Or of the fancy'd, description florid,
 Which Lucian gives, of the Elysian shades!
 For gazing, we may feast the wand'ring sight;
 Convolv a few of Nature's boundless works!
 Then blest the firm omnipotence of God!

---

EVENING.

As th' traveller, when near his journey's end
Makes thrice the speed he hitherto has done :
So Phœbus scours in haste the west of heav'n.
Now ploughmen weary, quit the furrow'd fields,
And shepherds leave their tender fleecy care.

Lo! the horizon—how richly vary'd;
Low'ring—here heavy clouds of smoke are seen;
There, brightest flames emboss the opal sky!
Awful grandeur!—the heavens seem on fire!
Look as a mass of gold yon windows blaze,
Burnish'd so high as nearly fears the sight.

Lo! silver Cynthia shews her modest brow,
And by Cynthus brighter beams discourag'd,
Mourns in sadness pale her want of power!
As when an artist, long high-priz'd for skill,
Meets a pow'rful compeer in the lists of fame,
He pines, as Luna, losing worldly note,
And sinks in Lethe's dark revolving lake,
Never alas! to rise in splendor more:
Thus merit murders merit diffident,
As a misteeming woman in the hour

EVENING.

As th' traveller, when near his journey's end
Makes thrice the speed he hitherto has done :
So Phœbus scours in haste the west of heav'n.
Now ploughmen weary, quit the furrow'd fields,
And shepherds leave their tender fleecy care.

Lo! the horizon—how richly vary'd;
Low'ring—here heavy clouds of smoke are seen;
There, brightest flames emboss the opal sky!
Awful grandeur!—the heavens seem on fire!
Look as a mass of gold yon windows blaze,
Burnish'd so high as nearly sears the sight.

Lo! silver Cynthia shews her modest brow,
And by Cynthus brighter beams discourag'd,
Mourns in sadness pale her want of power!
As when an artist, long high-priz'd for skill,
Meets a pow'rful compeer in the lists of fame,
He pines, as Luna, losing worldly note,
And sinks in Lethe's dark revolving lake,
Never alas! to rise in splendor more:
Thus merit murders merit diffident,
As a missteeming woman in the hour

Of Nature's trial dang'rous—one poor soul,
Perforce must perish, to preserve the other.

Lift! lift ye worthy to the artless lay,
Ye, whom Providence and Fortune bounteous,
Have blest with plenty, never-knowing want,
Dependant want, that bender of the soul,
Warping the noble mind to meanness oft,
That meanness, sharper than the fellest fang
Of indigence, or mis'ry's clymax, high!
Oh! cramp luxuriance, in the bed of lust,
Then search the wants of wretchedness, unsought,
And give the surplus to the pining poor:
Those most I mean, that sigh in modest woe.

Look o'er yon hill, how beauteous th' expanse
If aught can likeness heav'n's Omnipotent,
'Tis setting Phœbus in the midst of glory!
Now as the Godhead lower shows, the face
Of æther's deck'd with STREAKS of liquid fire.

The birds sing sweetly at the parting day,
And wafts Apollo into heaven's gates,
With suiting powers of sweetest melody!

Yonder's the cot, that lodg'd my father's friend,
His dearest, much-lov'd friend, old honest Eaton.
Oh! memory,—wou'd thou wert absent now—
E'en as the world, when merit is in want;
Oh! I cou'd swallow draughts of Lethe down,

Until the warders of the brain were drown'd,
 The deed no sooner done—gone by—forgot—
 Deep buried, ne'er to strike the wand'ring thought.

He had a daughter, fair as opening dawn;
 Am'ranth immarcessible! sweetest of sweets!
 Roses and lillies blended in her cheeks!
 Loveliest of the lovely—softly supine!
 The form of Venus, chasten'd by Dian's brow!
 Dame Nature, when she undertook the work,
 From every fair inhabitant above,
 Borrow'd a gift, to send a wonder here,
 Perfect—and paragon her own bright image!

Oh! for an angel's pen, profusely soft,
 Agile to lavish on the charming maid,
 Praises—such as religion gives to saints,
 And drawing her sweet picture from my mind,
 Strike mortals wonder—smacking of heav'n's self!
 Painful rapture—proceed we to our tale.

Fair Emma lov'd Philander well;—ah! me
 Too well alas! for such a perjur'd youth;
 His fire a worldling, rich and pow'rful was;
 But riches had no pow'r with her, sweet soul!
 In faith she lov'd him for himself alone.
 With grief old Eaton saw, she treasur'd up
 His honey vows, and lock'd 'em next her heart:
 For thro' the veil of education's sense,

He cou'd discern a meanness of ability ;
 And (tho' deep cloak'd with seeming worth) a heart
 Callous to heav'n-born humanity !

One morn he met him, where yon spreading oaks,
 Proud of their vigour, rears their saucy heads,
 Ixion like, to kiss the mocking cloud ;
 And keenly, with a father's cautious eye,
 Oft question'd him on love ?—the shameless youth,
 Supposing him too poor to need disguise,
 Told him flat stories of his sev'ral loves !
 How many fair ones sigh'd for virtue lost ;
 How many honor'd dames, for favor su'd ;
 Yet he alike despis'd them all !—on these
 And such wild themes, he long fantastic dwelt :
 At length they parted—he to custom'd sports,
 Old Eaton to his home, seeking his child ;
 He found her seated on a violet bed,
 Weeping over the sad distressing tale,
 Of Philomela's woes, full sad indeed !
 Oft unseen he look'd—paternal fondness,
 While the big tears stole down his hollow cheeks ;
 Wiping them off—he thus began : come near
 My Emma, darling of my age, come near !
 When thy poor mother, Emma, dy'd and left me,
 Lone as th' turtle-dove, full wan with sorrow ;
 Each sad day, more than dying, since her death :

For thrice nine years she fill'd these wither'd arms
 And liv'd, (oh! heav'n!) blest in love's sweet magic!
 My only comfort then on earth was thee:
 Oft have I fondly gaz'd, and in thee trac'd
 Her much-lov'd lineaments!—her ev'ry feature!
 When smiling, I have kiss'd and hugg'd thee close
 Close my Emma.—Oh! child wert thou perverse
 And proudly careless of thy father's will,
 Ah! soon, ah! soon, 'twou'd bow this hoary head,
 With sorrow magnetic, to the silent grave!
 Thou then wou'dst weep my Emma, and lament
 Thy poor old father's loss;—I know thou wou'dst:
 For goodness and perfection, all are thine
 But list to my unfolding, Emma list.
 Beware—in time beware the practis'd wiles,
 And cruel subtilties of faithless man:
 Thy tender years and conscious innocence,
 Of ripen'd judgment, leave thee more in want:
 For Emma, dear my child, too plain I see
 Thy love for one, I fear the very worst—
 The one most cruel of the cruel race:
 You wot the man I mean—Philander!—nay,
 Restrain those gushing tears, my life's sweet balm,
 They scald thy pallid cheek, and chill my heart!
 Yet for stern justice sake, as well as thine,
 A parent's duty, bids me not recede;

Go on I must:—yet woe alas! the day!
 I see in this, (avert it gentle heav'n)
 Thy certain fate, and mine; in my old age,
 Spite of my care, I've caught affliction's cup,
 And perforce must drink, deep, to th' very dregs,
 The bitter, bitter draught, lugubrious!
 Unless kind Providence take part with me,
 His form strikes truly, fair as rosy morn;
 But oh! I fear his mind's as midnight dark:
 Honest he seems; but all are not true men,
 Who play on Nature, seeming so much more:
 Religion and morality, are cloaks
 To black deception;—'tis as who shou'd say,
 A devil dresses in an angel's garb!
 Ill-got wealth and pow'r, now, are sanctions base,
 For ev'ry evil, villany, and rudeness!—
 Nay weep not sweet!—for—honest yet he looks;
 But to look honest is the deceiver's art!
 The most apparent good, often turns out,
 (Spite of th' fairest face,) our very worst of ills!
 Security lulls, till conquest falls asleep
 Pride-sick, yet impotent in all—save thought.
 Trust not his angel smiles; I know him, false;—
 Mark! Emma, mark!—thou wilt know more and soon.
 Alack! grief never comes, without a long
 Attendant train! but now, a stripling gave me

This letter at the threshold :—the contents
 I fear to look on :—'tis from my brother.—
 Oh! Emma! he writes, th' damp, cold hand of Death,
 Hath put his stamp upon him—and begs me,
 Hasten to close the eyes—the dying eyes
 Of a trusty brother, loving, and belov'd!
 Oh! 'tis a grievous task;—so near in blood!
 I fear me much, this is a prelude sad,
 That speaks some tragedy far worse behind.
 Come fate what will, this moment I'll away,
 And as the fadd'ning son of Leda, weep,
 Till the night-flame, Ignis fatuus, drown,
 Niobe like, in depth of stubborn dole.—
 Tho' sixty miles, (the obsequies perform'd,)
 Ere Phæbus thrice the hot meridian mounts,
 So please th' Almighty not to let my way!
 I will return, as meditation, swift.
 —One kiss, my Emma!—that may be the last!
 Away—what means my ill-presaging soul?
 Last night I dreamt an Eagle's goring fangs,
 Tore thee from my arms, and mounted straight to heav'n:
 Sure that was ominous;—but that's not all!
 Early this morning, as I walk'd the grove,
 A robin perch'd me on the shoulder top!
 What shou'd it mean?—pshaw, a childish weakness,
 All is not here at rest, and when the mind's diseas'd,

The pulse, as an ill clock, beat not in unison,
 Then vacant—nerveless lethargies creep in,
 And nothings quite unman us—Ha! three drops!
 And why not three, th' same as three and twenty?—
 One on my palm!—oh! mysterious heaven!
 Thy blessed will be done.—Farewel! farewell!
 And fate cries out, for ever, and for aye!

Now Sol, his blazing car, had scarcely drove.
 Beyond the midway heav'n, ere Emma's maid,
 Swift on the wings of keen impatience borne,
 Flew to Philander, with the welcome news
 Of Eaton's journey!—thrice he kiss'd the wretch;
 And full as oft made promises of gold,
 If she when Nature all lay hush'd at ease,
 And Somnus with his leaden wand, had wav'd
 The king of cares, in down, to balmy sleep!
 If she wou'd give him secret conduct, safe,
 Unknown to any, save the stars of heav'n,
 Into her mistress's chamber!—thus seduc'd
 By golden promises, the wretch comply'd!
 Oh! bane of honesty—thrice accursed gold!
 What worthless myriads, won by glitt'ring words
 And thee, have bought and sold their very God,
 And worshipp'd thee! thou foul deceiver, thee!
 Oh! that Chaos had o'ercome th' world again
 Ere midnight had arriv'd.—At length the hour,

Dark, approach'd, his villain purpose, aiding,
Thither he repair'd, with Tarquin haste, and was
By th' gold-loving, guilty wretch, admitted.

Now my heart throbs, and knocks against my breast
As 'twou'd force passage, to the open day!
Lie still! lie still! I have not wrung thee yet.

As the Dragon, watching the golden fruit;
Or Satyr, big with cruelty and lust,
The Dæmon crowding, in his hiding place,
Lay robber like, th' hour of plunder, waiting;
But ah! what wretch, so guilty, as the one,
Who robs and plunders, that, he shou'd protect?

She enter'd, placid, with a book in hand,
Which ever in her lonely hours she held,
And meditating on the tale she'd read,—
Where Dido wept, her dear Æneas' loss!
The tear at length, became a let to fight,
And she prepar'd to take some needful rest.

When she had part undress'd, and as Diana,
No secret, making, of her charms: like her,
Ne'er dreaming, of a foul Actæon, near!
Turning her eyes, she saw him, shriek'd aloud!
Darted fierce lightnings on him, and demanded,
Why he o'erleap'd the pales of modesty?
For what cause?—the great cause of love (said he),
Emma, behold thy dying lover—thus!

If thou'rt unkind—by all the blessed saints !
 By heav'n itself—and heav'n's likeness, thee !
 By those bright twinkling stars, in Æther's face,
 Or those still brighter, from thy matchless brow !
 By all the horrors that I suffer here,
 And those hereafter, due to mighty crimes,
 If thou'rt unkind, this moment is my last.
 Oh ! I am frantic ; love hath made me mad !
 Ah cruel maid !—I know not what I do !
 Tell me gentle Emma—quickly tell me,
 Hast thou not in cold obedience given
 Thy promis'd hand, if not thy faithless heart,
 To some lov'd youth, more favour'd than Philander ?
 Ah ! wretch accurst, thou like a flow'r art doom'd
 To droop forlorn, and wither in thy bloom ;
 Traduc'd by villain, spoilers of fair fame ;
 And now an outcast alien to thy love :
 What maniac's sorrows can be like to mine ?
 Poor trembling maid, full griev'd to see and hear
 Such seeming sad distress, fell on her knees
 And made a solemn vow ; when she forsook
 Her dear Philander !—in her dying moments !
 When her soul fled, full of expectant bliss,
 Might heav'n shut the door of gracious mercy !
 Oh ! angel sounds, (the wily youth replied).
 Sweet as salvation to the worst of sinners :

I must believe thee—thou'rt my oracle!
 Yet ere we sep'rate, promise the next dawn
 Shall make thee by the ties of wedlock, mine!
 And do you love your poor Philander still?
 Oh! 'twere more than sacrilege to doubt it!
 Yet oh! my boding heart!—this may be false,
 To lure a youth, most wretched made by love,
 Till lost inevitable—in destruction deep!
 Alas! what proff (rejoin'd the tender maid),
 Remains within my broadest pow'r to give?
 —What proff! my Emma?—Oh! one still remains,
 Wou'd make my troubles but an empty space!
 E'en that were nothing, as at dawn we wed,
 When none, save Death, the gordian knot unties:
 Think, think on that my love—nay—wonder not!
 If you deny, this is not truth you utter.
 Then embracing her with joy presuming,
 And dropping tears—false as the Crocodile,
 Which length'ning, crawls from Egypt's silver flood,
 To seek, with fang destructive, Inland prey!
 Ah! me, ah! me, can't thou not pity, Emma?
 'Tis fabled oft, women have tender hearts:
 It cannot be, for her I idolize!
 And worship next to heav'n—(nay more I fear!)
 Laughs at my grief, and mocks my sad despair!
 When one sweet smile, the smile of love approv'd,

Wou'd snatch a wretch from sorrow's drear abyss,
 Striking the clymax short of gath'ring woes,
 And build the ladder that ascends to heav'n;
 She must—my Emma—oh! I'm on the rack!
 You cannot sure refuse my fond request!
 I know thou'rt goodness all! and inborn worth,
 The pride of Nature is possess'd of thee!

Then rudely thrusting his unhallow'd hand,
 With villain fervour, in her iv'ry neck,
 Whiter by far than Lapland snows, new-fall'n!
 She check'd his ardour; but too faintly check'd:
 He press'd her tenderly to yield:—she sigh'd
 And wept—he press'd again: and oh! as oft
 He press'd, as oft th' orient pearly beads,
 Stole gently down her crimson blushing cheeks,
 (As dew drops from the damask rose) and hung
 With trembling lustre on her coral lip,
 Which he as oft kiss'd eagerly away.

Ah! wretched man (said he), to love so much
 And not be lov'd again!—not lov'd again!
 Ye guardian pow'rs of innocence distress'd,
 Bear witness for me, to what height I love;
 Nor e'er will cease to prove, by virtuous means,
 That my fond soul has not another wish:
 Then oh! sweet Emma, do not thus delay
 To prove thou ow'st me so much love indeed,

And teach the bankrupt heart to pay the same.
Then gently pulling her, she in his arms
Fainting—yielded—oh! God!—her virgin treasure.

Here stop we short—the die of Fate is cast;
Start back, bright radiance—heav'n's luminary
Hide thy fair face behind the thickest cloud,
And wand'ring—set in night!—in endless night!
Weep, angels weep—shed tears ye pitying saints,
And thus a second time the world deluge;
Punishing seduction's heavy crimes! let no
Good deed be done in this accursed hour;
Let deep'ning horrors multiply so fast,
That e'en arithmetic can't reckon up!
Let the broad face of this stupendous mass,
Be like the villains—smiling to deceive;
Let propagation make an awful stop;
Let brother (like the first sanguineous),
More than maniac fell—shed brother's blood;
Let fathers ruthless turn their deadly hate
Upon their sons; sons on their aged parents;
Each with dire vengeance warring 'gainst th' other,
Thrusting, Nero like, sweet Nature out of doors,
As a vile prostitute, to teem no more—
Till all things move against her common course,
And lose their make:—so end, oblivion dark—
For oh! the sweetest innocence is gone,

That e'er cheer'd feeble age, with filial care,
Or smil'd upon the blushing face of day.

Why does this diffidence o'ercloud my sight!
Why does my trembling knees each other knock!
My blood run chill! my languid pulse scarce beat!
I sink! I droop! expression where art thou?
Some turn or two, and then my palsy'd hand,
Snatching the bursting tumult of my heart,
My pen shall reassume!—pardon the pause.

Early i' th' morn, ere sun-rise, he arose,
Sated no doubt, (for sweetest things will fate,
Not lawfully begotten)—telling her
That he in sooth, and kindness dear of heart,
Wou'd instant forth, and pray his sire's consent;
And that an hour ere the silver moon, did
With her starry train spangle pale Æther's front,
He wou'd not fail, if life remain'd a gift,
On the slow-rising eminence to meet her,
Where beds of roses sweet, incarnadine
The velvet ground—afide the summer house,
Shaded with ivy, honeysuckle, and
With pretty jessamine beset so neat.

When the bestial wretch, tir'd with Tarquin lust—
And Cataline deceit; as either eminent
In what pertain'd to hell, and guilt unheard of!
When he preparing was to take his leave,

Oh! God of heav'n, th' miseries she endur'd!

She hung on him, sweet soul, and faltering

With voice scarce articulate, she said,

"This cruel parting, my existence steals,"

Sweet sensative, one rude touch, depriv'd thee

Of life, and all the comforts, age might yield.

He kiss'd her, made fair promises, and squeez'd

Her lilly hand, with seeming ardour, close;

Kiss'd again her pallid cheek; then parted,

Proud of his conquest—ne'er to see her more!

May the deep curses of Pandora, all,

Await his steps, till of existence weary,

With suicide, he ends a wretched life,

Big and replete with wond'rous villanies:

So stand enroll'd for hell's worst primal plagues,

Gods! as the boy—I cou'd shed tears and rant

For grief's beyond the pow'r of human cure!

The day pass'd on, and not one thought,

Emancipated from the prison'd whole,

Save th' advice, her tender father left her!

That!—that like a lightning cloud, condens'd;—or sea,

Bursting the barriers of the whiten'd shore,

With a loud crash, throws millions on the strand:

Emerging thus, her busy brain was rack'd.

And Incoherency sat with pow'r grim!

Hideous!—confus'd in pomp!—Night at length,

Sorrowful night, appear'd in darkness sad
 Array'd;—the wish'd, yet dreaded hour, approach'd :
 Time pitying her, perambulated slow,
 Kindly meand'ring—fearful of itself!

Now sorrowful, press'd down, with mis'ry's weights,
 Solemn and sad, she walk'd her to the bank,
 Where first was gain'd her virgin heart, with vows
 Of constant love, most pure appearing, then.
 No one cou'd her impatient eyes behold !
 Tho' the unteem'd hour might seem pass'd and gone :
 For gliding time, which with the woeful waits,
 Ling'ring in procrastination cruel,
 Mounts on swiftest pinions with the thoughtless gay.
 Half th' next glass, with horror most despondent,
 Such as ne'er touch'd her gentle mind before,
 She waited sad;—Philander not appear'd :
 (The wretch had gone a journey with a friend !)
 Frighted she rang'd about, calling his name !

Echo ! sad maid more deeply pitying that
 Which touch'd the story of her own hard woes,
 Answer'd in kindness from her secret cell :
 None, save her, and she in sadness equal !
 Then starting wild with joy extreme, she cry'd !
 “ I hear him coming!—oh ! sweet constant youth,
 “ I knew he wou'd not leave me, I shou'd mourn
 “ And die—poor Emma, wou'd be wretched ! hah

" 'Tis not him!—'tis the wind kissing the trees?
 " The fickle wind :—he ne'er will kiss me more.
 " Wilt thou not come, Philander?—wilt thou not."
 Then the big tears gush'd from her starry eyes.
 " Wilt thou not come?" (said she) poor innocent!
 Thy hapless fate, when thy sad tale is told
 Wou'd melt the hardest marble—an hour pass'd;
 She waited still, in sad condition seated:
 With downcast looks, with lilly hands, clasping
 The bended knee—ineffable in grief;
 Her streaming eyes, dropt tears incessantly!
 At last as one recovering from a trance;
 Or starting quick—an animated statue!
 She cried—" I will no longer bear this weight,
 " This three-fold weight, of misery and guilt;
 " Lucretia gave one blow, and all was peace.
 " Then oh! my tender father! yet I know
 " He'd rather I shou'd die, than live with—madness!
 " Oh! thou virtuous, good old man, what pangs—
 " No more! no more!—I linger—this to try!—
 " Oh! mountain on mountain fall—bury me quick,
 " Deep as the centre, or old Ocean's caves!
 " Peace!—the deed is done—he ruin'd me—and—
 " No more! no more!—Nature, thou'lt soon be paid."
 Then with a thorn, pricking her snow-white arm!

The crimson gore, follow'd the wound;—her eyes,
 Her comet eyes, that shone so bright, grew dim;
 The rose's bud, that lately blooming, liv'd,
 Flushing the sweet vermilion in her cheeks,
 Vanquish'd by th' pale lilly, yielded the prize,
 To the cold arms of Death; and as a turtle
 Lamenting her lost love; or a primrose
 Nipp'd by an April frost—she sunk and dy'd.
 For the mistaken crime, to terminate
 Such mighty woes!—oh God! oh God! forgive her.

Here leave we this hapless fair one, wrapp'd
 In silent shades, and turn to honest Eaton.
 Death he'd already dealt with: his brother
 Dy'd in his arms.—Scarce had he trod th' margin
 Of the broad plain, where yonder cottage stands,
 But busy numbers told him what had fall'n:
 A tale like this soon spreads the village round.
 He ran distracted to the fatal place;
 Caught his lov'd Emma in his arms;—kissing
 Her clay-cold lips; and looking upward, seem'd
 T' accuse the gods, in silent eloquence!
 Then dropping her (for Death when first he heard
 The news, sapient, dire fate and he communing,
 With forceful blow, his very heartstrings riv'd)
 Woe-worn, luctuous, snatching her hand, he fell,

His face towards the earth, and ne'er arose,
 Or spake again.—The pitying crowd, entomb'd
 Their sad remains together—and inscrib'd
 A short memorial of their wretched fate.

Th' treacherous maid, who flew when Emma dy'd,
 Ne'er tarry'd till Philander she had found;
 And told th' sad tale—most bitterly he wept.
 And stung by conscience—or I know not what,
 At night, resolv'd to see once more, the place
 That had so fatal prov'd;—poor satisfaction
 For Emma, murder'd lamb!—was that a requiem
 For her departed soul? Ah! no! He came;
 Search'd the red dye, incarnadin'd by blood
 That issued from the wound:—he wept! he tore
 His rugged locks, and howl'd in deep despair,
 The bitterest imprecations on himself!—
 Then glaring wild, striking his forehead, cried,
 Whip me ye devils with your flaming brands!
 Ha!—gracious heav'n, what weeping form is that?
 'Tis she! 'tis she!—and angels 'tend her down!
 Th' Saviour of mankind!—was three days punish'd!
 Then rose!—but 'tis not so with her! sweet shade
 I bow in rev'rence!—lo! the deadly sting!
 Now she perforates her lilly arm!—now
 The streaming gore, forth gushes from the wound!

—Now—now she falls!—Save—Oh madness, save me!
 'Tis malice of the gods to torture thus :
 Lapithæ's prince ty'd roasting on the wheel ;
 Sisyphus th' stone perpetual rolling ;
 Tantalus steep'd his throat in boiling blood ;
 Phlegias fearful of the waving rock ;
 Or mighty Tityus chain'd, while Vultures peck'd,
 And gnaw'd his liver, of eternal growth :
 Those! conjoin'd, were punishments—pitiful,
 To the deep horrors that surround me now !
 Soft!—She's vanish'd—and wav'd me to follow,
 With th' most benignant smile ! Oh ! misery !
 Misery!—that stings deep ! proceed—I come !
 Sweet shade I follow!—ay to th' very brink
 Of vast eternity!—then down he fell,
 E'en as the unknown hand of Pow'r struck him!—

The sky grew thick, condens'd ; the rains beat hard ;
 The thunders roll'd along the distant vaults,
 In angry parle ; the vivid lightnings flew.
 He rose to meet the storm ; when the red arm
 Of ireful heav'n sent a dreadful flash,
 Which hurl'd Philander, blazing to the ground.
 " Yet I will rise—another !" (he exclaim'd)
 " Nay then 'tis warring with the mighty gods ;
 " And giants cannot do it!—Oh ! I'm lost !

" Destructions come! now devils drag me down!"

" Sweet mercy! mercy!—I had none! none! none!"

" I sink! I'm drown'd in foaming seas of blood!"

" Good devils, fling not a heart, already flung

" By fate's dire arrows to untimely death:

" Fell fiends!—loosen your grasp! you've only pow'r

" O'er my soul!—my body now is—nothing."

And thou oh! Muse, pardon this digression;
The mournful tale, hung heavy on my mind;
As tears are oft, a sweet relief to woe,
Disclosing it has eas'd my troubl'd heart.

Thus in emanation, we the chaste Muse
Punish;—snatching bright objects as they rise;
Courting ascending thought time-serving all.

Nor scorn oh! Eminence th' unpolish'd lay,
Since half afraid to touch the sounding lyre,
Our trembling hand recoil'd; nor dealt it e'er
With elegance of form or pomp of words:
'Tis ours to strike with Nature's simple tale,
The gentle heart that beats for foreign woes:
To gentle hearts—oh! may they aye be so.

Yon marble clouds, as mountains seem, or rocks,
Whose heads o'ertop the liquid element,
Hoary, and awful to the shipwreck'd brave.
Lo! where declining Phœbus sinks beneath

Yon hill;—and casting forth his brighter beams,
 (For now the solar verge is only seen!)
 Expands his golden wings to climes unknown;
 Quite sunk to us, weary and out of breath,
 Tir'd of his diurnal journey, pants,
 Wide on the bosom of the boundless deep.

NIGHT.

DAUGHTER of Chaos, Night, in ebon car,
With poppy crown'd, by four jet coursers drawn,
Wide spreads her sable mantle as she creeps,
Embracing coldly half the æther ball,
Hail Nox, sorrowful goddess! Hail thou balm,
And sweet restorer of the lab'ring hind,
At whose long-wish'd approach the rugged frowns
Of hungry care, vanish in haste afar,
And smiles bedimple o'er the rustic's face;
Whose coming brings a welcome hard-earn'd meal,
Perhaps the only one since rising sun:
Yet even he, in thoughtless penury,
Can sit him down, and feast on rich content,

In him the want of riches is no want,
Passing as the subtle wind, unheeded by:
No unlook'd for rise can fortune give him,
Nor poverty griping, throw him farther back,
With feeling sensible, and bitter fall.

He lives, and has a thousand means to live,
Shou'd present living fail! cheerly with use,

And rising Phœbus does his toil begin;
 With setting eve, 'tis done; when swift as thought,
 Or as a Miser to count o'er his wealth:
 He flies to share the fond, and lov'd embrace,
 Of some kind duteous mate, as Dian true;
 And oh! the dear heart-ravishing delights
 Of sweetest prattle, from a num'rous offspring.

And who shall say, but heav'n all-bounteous, gave
 A mass of riches, in those soft endearments!
 The mines of Plutus cannot give as much!
 'Tis true, while Horus full of noontide pow'r,
 Darting wide flames, searing his nut-brown skin,
 With eagle eyes, he turns upon the god!
 And smiling, toil pervades;—but Oh! 'tis toil
 (Heart-cheering thought) 'tis toil for those he loves:
 That, and that only quickens every nerve,
 Giving each petty artery (from the heart,
 Leading the vital spirit thro' the whole)
 Herculean strength!—he rolls in living wealth!

And thou, oh! ear-delighting Philomel
 Thrice welcome :---thy plaintive strains mellifluous,
 Charm my all-wonder ravish'd senses, soft,
 As tho' the vaults of heav'n open'd wide,
 And choirs of angels tun'd their melting lays,
 Enchanting us frail mortals here below,

With dulcet tides of heav'nly harmony!
 Oh! what a dying fall was there!—again
 Sweet mournful bird! Oh! wou'd I cou'd command thee.

Yonder th' gloomy Owl, enthron'd in Ivy
 With sadness sits, unheeded of its kind,
 And looks a grave forsaken Majesty.
 Welcome Minerva's bird, wisdom for aye,
 Knowing whose thou art, must sacred hold thee.

Behold! Lucina breaks yon silver cloud,
 And peeping 'tween the wormless Cedars tall,
 On the soft, murm'ring, crinkl'd streamlet plays:
 Now she o'ertops the mountain clouds, and shines,
 Peerless, like Chastity, serene indeed!

As divine Seneca, here sit we down,
 Thoughtful on heav'n, and inly ruminate,
 The good and evil of the day pass'd by.
 'Tis done, most certain; cannot be recall'd:
 'Tis mark'd in heav'n's record; save penitence,
 Nought can blot it out.—Our gathering crimes
 We wou'd forget, most willingly forget;
 Yet, in remembrance, 'tis good we have them;
 By example present, we may avoid
 Future ills: then shou'd grim Death elect us,
 We stand the fairer candidates for heav'n.

Night brings reflection! and oh! when we reflect,
 Say who wou'd tread Ambition's ruthless path!

What's all the pomp of Vanity supreme,
 When a few poor hours casts—our sum of being!
 Morning, the Infancy; and Spring of life;
 Noon, the hot Prime, and Summers of our day;
 Evening, th' break, and Autumn's wane, opaque;
 Night, feeble Age and cheerless Winter's gloom,
 When Death steps in and closes our account!
 Thus boasted ancestry! high birth! envy,
 Pride, and vain glory—moulders into nothing.

The mount Ambition has a pleasing top;
 A blaze of glory, seems encircl'd there;
 But he who climbs, as th' foolish moth, too high,
 Resistless flies, tow'rd's the alluring flame,
 Quick terminating in a blazing ruin.

— Down, down Ambition, 'tis a restless toil.

Crowns are baubles—alas! no envy'd things.
 Full narrow are the paths that mortals tread;
 A deep and drear abyss on either side!
 But Rulers!—narrower still:—one stumble,
 (And many things there are attract the sight)
 Myriads of beings, ineffable may fall!
 The veriest clown, when's daily task is done,
 Is happier than the proudest of them all:
 Supine in agile thought, he sleeps content,
 Nor aught disturbs him, till th' soaring lav'rock,
 Calls him to plough:—he whistling goes. A king!

Ten thousand dreams disturb his pillow'd rest:
Thought, devours thought, no sooner teem'd, than swallow'd.

The parent of a wild and scatter'd offspring;
He fears for all—and knows not why he fears!

Perhaps in wasteful war, destructive, plung'd;
Plung'd by court sycophants! harpies, greedy!
Insects of fashion, pageantry and pomp;
The stings of nations, and th' curse of Princes!
Thus oft does manly resolution sink,
As virtue, lost by silver-tongu'd Persuasion!

What art thou War, that at thy dire approach
Thou fright'st pale-fac'd Humanity afar!
Seeking for shelter in some foreign clime?
And Echo, scar'd at thy all-blasting breath
Hides in her moss-grown cave, and dare not name thee!
Can there be music in each dying groan,
That thou thy iron face doth dress in smiles,
Those smiles that beam most foreign to thine heart?
Can the field incarnadin'd, be of tread,
Soft as the velvet carpeting of Peace?
Can the blood gushing from each gaping wound,
Pleaze thee as tears, new-fall'n at Pity's shrine!

Oh! for Jove's thunder, quick to hurl the wretch,
With redd'ning bolt, deep as the centre down,
In whose fell breast, hell's blackest fiends, infus'd

Dire cruelty, and Pity flieht away :

Oh! where art thou, dear Pity to be found,

If not inhabiting the breasts of men ?

The honest part, 'twou'd make with eagle fang,

Dig deep in the bowels of th' vilest earth,

(For in the vilest earth, she sure must dwell)

And tear up Pity by the very roots!

Tremble, thou wretch! thou harbinger of blood!

Thou prosecutor of a war, unjust!

Or dwell'st thou here, or on the farthest shore,

That Sol in his diurnal journey views;

Hid'st thou in cavern, rock, or i' th' centre,

The very centre of unfathom'd deeps,

Destruction in some horrid shape awaits thee!

Be thy brows bound with regal ornament,

Or wear'st thou greatness in some other form!

Thou art hell's own; most deeply lost! to thee,

The coal-black Indian is as pure as snow:

The father's murder, and the orphan's cries;

The widow's moans, and tears of purple gore;

Th' heart-rending sighs, augmenting the keen blast;

Th' envenom'd miseries, sharper than the steel,

Or bullet deadly!—instruments of death!

Nay ev'ry gun that roars, Jove's thunder mocking,

Thou in thy heart receiv'st, mistaken man,

'Tis thou that fall'st:—the sword that's only aim'd

To strike the gentle and entrenchant air,
 Prefs daily deeper, thy insatiate soul
 Tho' thy proud heart holds thee, buoyant high,
 Plunging thy hated, sea-sick, weary bark,
 In tides of blood, to bear thy greatness up!
 Still th' rude storms of conscience will annoy,
 And vultures ope their dire, horrific jaws!
 Swallowing thyself—and poorer greatness up.

Is there a place throughout the world's extreme,
 That such a reptile ought to call his own?
 Yes one—him there some genii quick convey,
 Far from the shore, where peace and plenty dwell:
 Uproar ye billows, and assault the clouds!
 Rise hurricanes from Terra's central void!
 And blow with whirlwinds sweep the guilty wretch,
 To that foul shore, where Sodom deep ingulf'd,
 With all its filthy reptiles lie: Sodom
 From foul and filthy deeds of guilt, so call'd!

Fast by this steril soil, the desert dreadful!
 Where first the evil spirit try'd to win
 The Lord's anointed son:—but try'd in vain,
 Unhallow'd spot! horror with horror teeming!
 Many-headed! the gloomy whole throughout!
 Forfa'en of all mankind, to this dread spot
 Confin'd—there let him sit and meditate,
 On faction direful:—than whom, more guilty, none.

Be it not his; to view from those dread cliffs,
 Arabia's hills;—'tis blessing far too great :
 His the dead sea, where misty mountains guard,
 Fatal to th' feather'd heaps who fain wou'd wing
 Their airy flight : for the air close condens'd,
 Their wings no longer skim the liquid space,
 So wont of late, free as itself to rove ;
 They swell ! they fall ! fill'd by vapours foul !
 A prey to monsters, in the thick'ning lake,
 Who open mouth'd receive 'em, as the shark,
 Or as the serpent, close at Eden's gate,
 Watching the fall of our first parents sad.
 The black'ning pebbles on the frothy strand,
 Bubbling—kindle a blue sulphurous blaze ;
 The finny tribes, portentious roll along,
 Pois'nous to see;—most pestilent to touch.

Nor his e'en here, the farther part to view :
 Northward of th' deep, border'd with Tam'rind close
 Many a dark maze through, and craggy steep,
 The holy waters of the Jordan wind !
 Let not his presence blight the fruitful shore ;
 But brooding with despair, and famine, meagre,
 Yield up his guilty ghost to ready fiends,
 While birds ill-omen'd, flit around his head,
 And scream to catch th' morsel foul, cadav'rous !
 There let him rot, without the needful rite

Of decent obsequies, or mourning friends!
 (To say thus much, "He's gone, God rest his soul.")
 A prey to blood, and dire ambition foul;
 To war, and int'rest base—example dreadful!

Oh! Tully! what amazing gifts were thine!
 Thou surely as Prometheus, stole from heav'n
 That fire, that lively energetic fire,
 Which e'en the dullest clod must animate!
 And I'll think (not for 'tis thine opinion)
 That when Cæsar, in Brutus, met his fate,
 There laid a cav'ling, poor, dissentious rogue.
 Give me th' man, whose sensibility, and sense,
 Like twins go hand in hand, life's barriers thro':
 But oh! to see a man, by goddess nature,
 Gifted with talent, broad, capacious!
 Yet rotten as an apple at the heart,
 Contempt and pity, thrill thro' every vein,
 I feel! — I know not how! — such wretch I scorn!
 Oh! 'tis a villain, with an eyesight clear!
 'Tis Satan abusing heav'n, in the midst
 Of heav'n's self! a God with human frailty.

We cannot look for reason in a fool.
 He sins in error; 'tis not conscious guilt;
 A murder in a dream! — oft by pointing
 The horrors of the crime he wou'd commit,
 Alarm'd! he hastily repents, and spurns

The dire mischief, as fell poison from him;
 But in the wretch sanguineous! by Nature
 Endow'd with reason, more than common sense,
 'Tis murder aforethought! or e'er 'tis done,
 He sees the streaming gore before his eyes!
 He pauses in contrivance (horrid pause!)
 And does the deed with unrecoiling hand!
 That! that is bold fac'd guilt, hell meriting!
 And I can feel more pity, for the broad
 Insatiate crimes of Nero, than in compare,
 The well-seeming, nothingness of Cæsar's.

Ponder our annals thro', there's not a one
 That owes his fate to his severity:
 Painful th' task to tell, how many princes
 Have been butcher'd, owing their mild natures,
 A fault angelic, (if a fault it is)
 Too much of human kindness!—sadd'ning thought,
 Henry of England! Louis too of France,
 Are of meek-ey'd lenity, examples sad!
 Oh! I cou'd petrify—weep into stone,
 When those poor monarch's cross my imag'ry!
 Away! dull thought! cling not so fast upon me.

Goodness hath birth from bad appearance oft,
 Thrusted to light, by Providence divine;
 And half the blessings we enjoy to her,
 And accident, we owe, matur'd by man

First, th' leathern-wing'd ship of Charon mould,
 In which th' tardy Mariner ventur'd out;
 A little from the land;—next with hollow bark,
 They strike old Ocean's surface; till at length
 Aægeon, or Semiramis, th' swelling sail,
 Stately, fill'd with blustering wind and strong
 Invented for their use: when th' bold Pilot
 By the spangl'd heav'n's guided, brav'd the deep,
 Safe in experience, unknown tracts they trace,
 While Seamen hardy climb her topmast yard;
 The saucy wave lash'd her strong brazen sides,
 And Commerce spread her golden wings around.

Two brilliant stars now i' th' west of heav'n,
 Twinkle as the diamonds in Eliza's face!
 Ha! why shou'd one drop?—certain 'twas a tear,
 Let fall in pity for her lover's woes.
 Tell me, bright semblance, tell me hast thou sworn
 Cold chastity, like thy fair mistress there?
 If so—'twou'd be vanity to woo Thee.

Lend me thy lyre, Mitylenean Sappho!
 Thou immensely felt th' turbid pow'r of love;
 Thoughtless of thy lurid woes! influent
 Spread the soft refinement round, with myrrhine
 Scents, delectable and sweet! oh! form th' foul
 Immutably to love; and raise th' human mind,
 To Godlike inspiration! from that fountain

Flows th' gen'rous draught, to evil, Lethean,
 Enforcing goodness, purifying all!
 Virtue and Love, as inmates ever dear.

What orbs of sight doth cluster æther's front!
 No marvel, that the God of light, all sees:—
 Th' Argus-face of heav'n hath an eye for each!
 Errors they wink at—viewing guiltiness,
 They start with horror back!—but th' goodly deed,
 Bring the huge drop that sparkles in the orb,
 E'en as th' glorious sun, when he doth show,
 Beauty thro' tears—like weeping majesty!
 Such graciousness hath God in virtues view!
 What in magnificence, and grandeur, can
 With those nocturnal globes refulgent vie!
 Th' di'mond-paved heav'ns, tell how rich the place!
 All this, and more, hath his beneficence,
 Promis'd to those that follow virtue's path!
 How immense th' gift!—how little our deserts!

Gazing with lovers fondness, I cou'd stay
 The live-long night—in adoration wrapp'd!
 E'en till Aurora in her golden car,
 Whipping her fiery couriers thro' the east,
 Pluck'd me from my enchanted revery!
 Adieu! ye bright inhabitants, adieu!
 Ye splendid tribes of unknown worlds, farewell!
 Death's image, sleep, hangs on my leaden brow,

And weary'd Nature calls for needful rest.
 Adieu, oh Cynthia! bright transcendent maid!
 Adieu ye constellations! lamps of Æther!
 Heav'n's banquetting lights! celestial bodies!

On DEATH.

Oh! Lamb of heav'n! Omnipotent divine!
Open thy gates, of grace and mercy, wide,
And let a soul-repentant sinner in!

What awfulness is seated in the form
Of each attending on the good man's exit!
Death, thou hast nought to conquer, here. Behold!
What mild serenity (composure sweet!)
Dwells in the visage of the dying man:
Oh! pow'rful proof of a well-guided life!
Lo! now he turns him in the easiest form;
And looking up, in adoration mute!
Clasping his hands—he like a lamb expires!
Not e'en the farewell groan, emancipate,
The signal of the soul and body's parting!
So tacit his adieu, the standers by,
Wrapp'd full in silent woe, can scarcely tell,
Whether the spirit's from the body fled.
He sleeps eterne! the storms of life, no more
Triumphant dash his sea-sick weary bark!
Farewel! farewell blest hallow'd saint; Angels,

Ay myriads, with their tuneful choir descend,
And waft thy soul, in melody to heav'n!

Reform ye libertines, and learn from this,
Of faint-ey'd Penitence, the wond'rous pow'r!
Can th' wretch, in his awful hour (for 't must come)
Lab'ring with mighty crimes, and prest with doubt,
Fearful if salvation reach his least of ills!
Meet his dread audit, with a peace like this?
Ah! no—the mind in strongest colours paint,
The pangs and tortures of th' dying maniac:
Oh! horrible!—lo! he grins in anguish!
Now his red balls he rolls! at nothing grasps!
Look, how he glares, as he'd transpierce ye thro't!
Behold! he beckens, as he wou'd impart
Something too huge for utterance!—Alas!
Poor wither'd wretch, and dost thou weep? why then
There's hope of mercy yet—mercy which like
The dew of heav'n, cheers the drooping flower.
Now, now he's off again!—poor tortur'd soul,
Oh! how thy crimes convulse thee! Hark! he speaks—
“Save me! oh save me!”—Angels catch the sounds,
And bear 'em on your rosy pinions, swift,
T' th' lenient records of Almighty God!
Behold!—this moment is his last!—see how
He writhes in torment, as his heart wou'd burst!

Lo! in dire extremity, his parch'd mouth
Bites th' poor covering of his wretched couch;
Now! now behold!—he rises! groans, and dies.

Oh! may the God of mercy, in the day
Of trial, call thy fleeting soul to peace,
And leave thy crimes forgotten, in the grave.
